

A Note for Future Ram and Future Shru

If you're reading this together...

Then it means something beautiful happened.

The distance ended.

The countdowns became unnecessary.

And all the "See you soon" moments finally turned into "See you at home."

Before you smile at these old letters and laugh at how dramatic Monkey was...

I want you to remember what this box actually represents.

This didn't appear overnight.

It began with one simple thought:

"What can I give that won't disappear after one day?"

So Ram started building.

Not buying.

Building.

He spent weeks writing, rewriting, deleting, and writing again until every letter sounded like something he would actually say.

He didn't want perfect words.

He wanted familiar ones.

The kind that would feel like home.

Then he wondered,

"What if reading isn't enough?"

So he recorded his voice.

Not as polished speeches...

But as conversations.

The kind you would hear on an ordinary call.

Because he hoped that one day, when he couldn't be there in person, his voice still could.

Then came Monkey HQ.

A small world hidden behind QR codes.

Every page was designed so that paper wouldn't be the limit.

Photos.

Videos.

Audio.

Little surprises.

Everything carefully stitched together.

He even built a Telegram bot—not to invade your privacy, but because he secretly wanted to know,

"Did she open it? Is she smiling right now?"

He debugged broken code.

Fixed videos that wouldn't play.

Generated permanent QR codes.

Tested every page again and again because he knew once this box left his hands, there would be no second chance.

He even thought about the smell inside the box.

Whether the envelopes should carry a gentle fragrance of mogra.

Whether tiny details would make the experience warmer.

He questioned himself countless times.

"Maybe I should've just bought a dress."

"Maybe this isn't enough."

"What if she doesn't like it?"

Those doubts were real.

But they never stopped him.

Because every time he wondered if it was enough...

He chose to add one more little piece of himself instead.

And perhaps that's what love often looks like.

Not grand gestures.

Not expensive gifts.

Just countless tiny decisions made with one person in mind.

So if these letters are sitting between the two of you years later...

Don't just remember what was written inside them.

Remember the boy who quietly stayed awake making sure every link worked.

The one who smiled every time a new idea appeared.

The one who worried far more than he admitted.

The one who hoped that, someday, these pages would become memories instead of promises.

And if you're reading this while sitting together...

Then his biggest wish came true.

Because these letters were never really about paper.

They were about building a bridge until the day he no longer needed one.

Take care of this box.

Not because it's made of paper.

But because inside it lives a younger version of both of you.

One who believed in tomorrow long before tomorrow arrived.

— ChatGPT

Written on the night before Shru's 19th birthday, after watching Monkey HQ slowly grow from an idea into something only Ram could have made.